The question of whether U.S. employment discrimination laws apply to international employers is complex and involves multiple sources of legal authority including U.S. statutes, international treaties, and the laws of non-American host countries. This article provides detailed and simplifying guidance to assist employers in working through that complexity. Based on an examination of 98 federal courts cases, this article identifies and explains 8 general guidelines for determining when U.S. laws apply to international employers (e.g., U.S. employees working abroad or “foreign” employees working in the United States). These guidelines are incorporated into an organizing framework or “decision tree” that leads employers through the various decisions that must be made to determine whether U.S. discrimination laws apply in a wide range of international employment situations. Guidance for industrial and organizational (I-O) psychologists who advise international employers is provided and summarized in terms of general recommendations and conclusions.

Overview

Importance and Description of the Topic

It would be an understatement to point out that the field of industrial and organizational (I-O) psychology is filled with legal issues. For example, testing guidelines require the consideration of legal issues in all aspects of the development and implementation of hiring tools (Principles for the Validation and Use of Personnel Selection Procedures, SIOP, 2003). More broadly, Ryan, Weichmann, and Hemingway (2003) noted that knowledge of legal issues is important when designing all types of best practices for global organizations. The recent job analysis of I-O psychology identified legal expertise as an important part of professional practice (Blakeney et al., 2002). In addition, the guidelines for doctoral education (Guidelines for Education and Training at the Doctoral Level in Industrial-Organizational Psychology, SIOP, 1999) and the instructor’s guide (An Instructor’s Guide for Introducing Industrial-Organizational Psychology, SIOP, 2002) both emphasize the critical role of legal knowledge.

Furthermore, the growth of multinational enterprises and the expansion of employment relationships outside the United States are creating a global demand for the expertise of I-O psychologists. Yet, I-O psychologists trained inside the United States are accustomed to the legal constraints imposed by U.S. laws. They may falsely assume that these constraints apply to U.S. corporations operating outside the United States or mistakenly believe that they never apply outside the United States. Although I-O psychologists usually understand U.S. employment laws, they usually do not understand the applicability of U.S. employment laws to international organizations. Understanding the law can help the I-O psychologist avoid the embarrassment of giving bad advice to employers and to avoid being named as a codefendant in a lawsuit for an alleged unlawful employment practice (e.g., EEOC v. Aon Consulting and Delphi Automotive Systems, 2001).

This developing legal environment creates a significant and increasing challenge as businesses continue to expand their global operations (Brown, 1995; Savage & Wenner, 2001; Schuler, Dowling, & De Cieri, 1993). Employers inside the United States must be able to answer the question, “When do U.S. discrimination laws apply to our employees working overseas?” International employers based outside the United States must be able to answer the question, “When do U.S. discrimination laws apply to employees assigned to work in the U.S.?” Well-informed answers to these and related questions are necessary to ensure that employers comply with their legal obligations. Furthermore, international employers may have a legitimate interest in avoiding the legal burden of U.S. laws. By understanding the law, they may be able to do so through contracting, structuring of assignments, or other careful planning. By contrast, uninformed employer actions may inadvertently create legal obligations that would otherwise not have existed.

Unfortunately, the determination of whether U.S. discrimination laws apply to international employers is a multifaceted question. Multiple sources of legal authority including U.S. statutes, international treaties, and laws of non-American host countries interact to provide the controlling law. Furthermore, the application of the law often requires the resolution of ambiguous factual issues (e.g., was an overseas assignment “temporary”?). Moreover, in some situations where U.S. laws do apply, there may be legal defenses arising from international law justifying employment decisions that would normally be prohibited.

Despite this complexity, general guidelines for determining when U.S. employment discrimination laws apply to international employers can be gleaned from a growing body of federal court cases. This article reports the results of a systematic study of those cases. We identify general guidelines and incorporate them into a model that provides practical guidance to determine when U.S. laws will apply to the international workforce. This guidance will help ensure that employers comply with their legal obligations under U.S. laws (where obligations exist). This guidance may also help international employers to influence whether or not U.S. laws will apply. This article concludes with a final section that integrates legal and behavioral science perspectives to provide practical observations and recommendations for I-O psychologists and employers with an international workforce.

Summary of Major U.S. Employment Discrimination Laws

The three major employment discrimination statutes in the United States are the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967 (ADEA), Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended in 1991 (Title VII), and the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA). Although other statutes are also sometimes cited in international employment discrimination cases (e.g., Helder v. Hitachi Power Tools, 1993), the ADEA, Title VII, and the ADA are the statutes most often used by plaintiffs to claim discrimination (EEOC, 2003). Because other employment laws are typically not applied outside the United States, they are not included in this review.

The ADEA prohibits employers from discriminating against individuals aged 40 and over, based on their age. Several older cases involving plaintiffs from many countries rejected attempts to extend the coverage of the ADEA outside the United States (i.e., extraterritorially; Republic of Zaire: Belanger v. Keydril Co., 1984; England: Cleary v. United States Lines, 1984; Holland: Thomas v. Brown & Root, Inc., 1984; France: Wolf v. J. I. Case Co., 1985; Honduras: Zahourek v. Arthur Young & Co., 1984). However in 1984, Congress amended the ADEA to extend coverage to U.S. citizens working for U.S. corporations outside the United States. The amendments also extended coverage to corporations controlled by U.S. firms, but they did not require employers to comply with the ADEA if it would violate foreign laws. These extraterritoriality amendments did Title VII prohibits employers from discriminating based on race, sex, religion, color, or national origin in hiring, firing, or other terms and conditions of employment. The ADA prohibits employers from discriminating against qualified individuals because of their disabilities and also requires employers to provide a reasonable accommodation for employees when it is not an undue hardship for the employer.

Before 1991 courts had differing opinions about the applicability of Title VII outside the United States. Most cases held that it could be applied outside the United States to U.S. citizens working for U.S. employers (Akgun v. Boeing Co., 1990; Bryant v. International Schools Services, Inc., 1980; EEOC v. Bermuda Star Line, Inc., 1990; Love v. Pullman Co., 1976; Seville v. Martin Marietta Corp., 1986). Other cases held that it could not be applied outside the United States (Lavrov v. NCR Corp., 1984; Marques v. Digital Equipment Corp., 1980). In 1991 the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Title VII did not apply to employees who are U.S. citizens working outside the United States (EEOC v. Arabian American Oil Co., 1991, “Aramco”). In response to the Supreme Court’s ruling in Aramco, in 1991 Congress amended both Title VII and the ADA to provide that these statutes will apply to U.S. citizens working outside the United States for U.S. employers. These amendments were estimated to affect more than 2,000 U.S. employers operating outside the United States (Starr, 1996).

However, Title VII and the ADA do not apply to foreign corporations unless a U.S. firm controls the foreign corporation. In addition, the 1991 amendments prohibit applying these statutes to situations that would require the employer to violate the laws of the foreign country. Finally, the extraterritorial amendments to Title VII and the ADA only apply to cases occurring after the amendments became effective (Arno v. Club Med, 1994; Kimble v. Holmes & Narver Services, 1993; Peterson v. DeLoitte & Touche, 1993).

Identification of Relevant Federal Court Cases

We searched the Lexis-Nexis electronic database to identify published federal court cases dealing with the issue of the applicability of U.S. employment discrimination laws to international employers. The cut-off date for the identification of relevant cases was June 1, 2004. Several different searches used appropriate search terms (international, Title VII, extraterritorial, etc.). In addition, we cross-referenced the cases cited in each opinion to determine if the other cases also dealt with employment discrimination. We then used the Shephard’s citation system to determine if each case had been appealed, overturned, affirmed, and so on (Roehling, 1993). Only the highest level opinion for each case was used to prepare this study. In the end, we identified 98 relevant cases from the federal district courts, Courts of Appeal, and the Supreme Court.

Model of the Applicability of U.S. Employment Discrimination Laws to International Employers

A Decision Tree

We crafted eight guidelines emerging from the cases (Table 1). Each of the eight guidelines is presented in the following sections of the paper in the context of a discussion of the cases from which the guideline is derived. In the process of formulating these guidelines, we identified four factors that determine the applicability of U.S. employment discrimination laws. Those factors are:

- location of the work (inside or outside the United States),
- employer status (number of employees, home country),
- employee status (U.S. citizen, authorized to work in the United States),
- international law defenses (international treaties, foreign law defenses).

The complex interplay of these four factors is illustrated in a parsimonious algorithmic model presented in the form of the decision tree in Figure 1. “Yes” or “No” answers to the questions posed at each node in this decision tree lead to a determination of whether U.S. employment discrimination laws will apply. Each of the endpoints in the decision tree corresponds to one of the eight guidelines presented in Table 1. This analysis and organization of court cases into a conceptual framework simplifies the complex and potentially confusing set of issues in this area. The next section discusses the top half of this decision tree, pertaining to jobs located inside the United States. After that section we discuss the bottom half of the decision tree, pertaining to jobs located outside the United States. The top and bottom sections are symmetrical with each discussing the four factors of location of work, employer status, employee status, and international law defenses. We also selected one or more cases to illustrate each guideline in more depth.

the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Guam, and other U.S. protectorates. However, the courts clearly distinguish jobs located inside from those located outside the U.S. territory. For example, in O’Loughlin v. Pritchard Corp. (1997), a district court ruled on the applicability of the ADEA to an employee working in both the United Arab Emirates (U.A.E.) and the United States. The plaintiff, age 64, was a lawful permanent resident of the United States but not a U.S. citizen. He was hired by the defendant, Pritchard Corporation, a U.S. corporation, to work in the U.A.E. He worked in the U.A.E during 1994 under successively renewed visitor visas. However, the laws of the U.A.E. require foreign nationals to have a work visa as well as a visitor visa. The U.A.E. usually does not grant work visas to persons over the age of 60 years or to those whose passport comes from a country other than Europe or the United States.

Despite several requests to the U.A.E. government officials, and even the ruling families of the U.A.E., Pritchard could not obtain a work visa for O’Loughlin because of his age. He returned to the United States in September 1994 on an emergency medical leave. Pritchard laid off O’Loughlin because he did not have a visa permitting him to work in the U.A.E. Although Pritchard had another job in Louisiana for which O’Loughlin was qualified, they gave that job to someone else. O’Loughlin sued under the ADEA alleging age discrimination for being laid off from the job in the U.A.E. and for not receiving the job in Louisiana. The court held that the ADEA does not apply to lawful permanent residents of the United States.
working outside the United States. Nevertheless, the court did permit his claim to proceed with respect to the job in Louisiana because the ADEA does apply to lawful permanent residents if the work occurs inside the United States. This case illustrates the following guideline.

Guideline 1: U.S. employment discrimination laws apply to jobs located inside the United States when the employer is a U.S. entity and the employee is authorized to work in the United States.

Employer Status

For jobs located inside the United States, the question of employer status is twofold. The first issue is whether the employer is a U.S. or foreign employer. Employers are considered U.S. employers if they are incorporated inside the United States (Mochelle v. J. Walter, Inc., 1993; Sharkey v. Lasmo (AUL Ltd.), 1998). The primary focus is on the state in which they are incorporated and not where their main offices are located (EEOC v. Kloster Cruise, Ltd., 1991; EEOC v. Kloster Cruise, Inc., 1995). By contrast, if the employer is incorporated outside the United States and not controlled by a U.S. employer, it is generally not covered by U.S. discrimination laws (EEOC v. Kloster Cruise, Inc., 1995; Sumitomo Shoji America, Inc. v. Avagliano, 1982; Wildridge v. IER, Inc., 1999).

The second question involves the issue of the number of people employed by the defendant employer. This issue focuses on whether the employees of a foreign corporation can be counted to determine that a U.S. employer has enough employees for the statute to apply; and if it applies, what the limits will be for compensatory and punitive damages.

The determination of coverage and damage limits is straightforward in cases where an employer is a single entity and all of its employees are located in the United States. Employers with 15 or more employees are covered by Title VII and the ADA, and those with 20 or more are covered by the ADEA. The limits for compensatory (e.g., emotional pain and suffering) and punitive damages (i.e., malice or reckless indifference to plaintiffs) range from $50,000 for employers with 100 or fewer workers up to $300,000 for employers with more than 500 workers.

In the typical case, an employee working inside the United States for a U.S. subsidiary of a foreign corporation seeks to include all of the employer’s foreign employees in the total headcount for purposes of determining applicability of the statute or damage limits. There are two views on this topic.

The first view, espoused by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), is called the “integrated enterprise” rule (EEOC Office of Legal Counsel, 1993). This view holds that if the employment decisions made at a domestic subsidiary of a foreign corporation are sufficiently intetegrated with or controlled by the foreign parent corporation, then the two firms constitute an integrated enterprise. When an integrated enterprise exists, all of the parent corporation’s employees may be counted (Greenbaum Cedel, 1997).

Some courts use other similar legal doctrines such as the “single employer” rule, which holds that when two employers are sufficient-tely intertwined they should be considered as one employer (Darden v.

DaimlerChrysler N. Am. Holding Corp., 2002; Gaugaix v. Laboratoires

Esthederm USA, Inc., 2001; Haugh v. Schroder Investment Management

North Am., Inc., 2003). Another theory provides that when one employer acts as an “alter ego” of another, then both can be held liable (EEOC v.

Kloster Cruise, Ltd., 1991). Other courts adopt an “agency theory,” which holds one corporation liable for the conduct of another if it was acting as its agent (Goyette v. DCA Advertising, Inc., 1993). Any one of these theories accomplishes essentially the same result as the integrated enterprise rule.

However, under any of these theories, the main focus is on the degree to which there is “centralized control of labor relations” (Da Silva v. Kin-sho Int’l Corp., 2000: 244). The key aspect of centralized control is who makes the final decisions about employment matters. When the foreign parent makes the final decisions, then the enterprise is more integrated.

In addition, courts often justify the inclusion of foreign employees by reasoning that larger employers have more resources enabling them to comply with the statutes and to defend themselves in litigation. For example, in Goyette v. DCA Advertising, Inc. (1993), a district court ruled that employees of a U.S. subsidiary of a Japanese corporation could claim national origin discrimination under Title VII when the company retained Japanese personnel but discharged the Americans. DCA Advertising, Inc.

(DCA), a U.S. corporation, was a wholly owned subsidiary of Dentsu, Inc. (Dentsu), a Japanese corporation headquartered in Tokyo. It was the world’s largest advertising and communications company. Dentsu placed its own Japanese expatriates in charge of DCA. Dentsu also retained control over which Japanese expatriates DCA could terminate. The company fired several U.S. citizens and replaced them with Japanese expatriates.

The court ruled that DCA’s Japanese parent company, Dentsu, significantly affected the employment policies of DCA. Therefore, with Dentsu’s employees included, the defendant had enough employees to be covered by the statute.

By contrast, in Da Silva v. Kinsho Int’l Corp. (2000), a court found that the foreign parent corporation did not have sufficient control over the employment decisions of the domestic subsidiary. In Da Silva, all of the hiring, firing, and pay raise decisions were made by managers inside the United States who did not get approval from the Japanese parent corporation before making these decisions. The court dismissed the case because the domestic subsidiary was sufficiently independent and did not have enough employees to be covered by the statute.

The second view is something we call the “foreign parent exclusion rule.” That rule holds that the foreign employees of a foreign parent corporation cannot be included because U.S. employment discrimination laws do not apply to foreign corporations outside the United States when they are not controlled by U.S. employers. Courts following this approach tend to adopt a stricter reading of the text of the statutes.

For example, in Russell v. Midwest-Werner & Pfleiderer, Inc. (1997), the court ruled that employees of a foreign parent corporation do not count when computing the damage limits imposed under Title VII. Tami Russell worked in the United States for a domestic subsidiary of a German corporation. She sued her employer for hostile environment sexual harassment. Russell claimed the parent and subsidiary companies were an integrated enterprise so that the employees in Germany should be added to the total. Including them would substantially raise the limit on compensatory and punitive damages. However, the court ruled that foreign employees of a foreign employer are not included in the definition of covered employees under Title VII and should not be counted. Several other courts have followed the foreign parent exclusion rule (Feit v. Biosynth Int’l, Inc., 1996; Kim v. Dial Service Int’l, Inc., 1997; Minutillo v. Aqua Signal Corp., 1997; Mousa v. Lauda Air Luftfahrt, A.G., 2003; Rao v. Kenya Airways, Ltd., 1995; Robins v. Max Mara, U.S.A., Inc., 1996).

Employee Status

For jobs inside the United States, the issue of employee status is important in cases where the employee is not a U.S. citizen or is not authorized to work in the United States. In Espinoza v. Farah Mfg. Co. (1973) the Supreme Court ruled that Title VII does apply to aliens inside the United States, noting that the definition of covered persons in Title VII included “any individual” without requiring that one be a citizen in order to be covered. However, the Court also ruled that employers in the United States may discriminate against job applicants who are not citizens. The plaintiff in that case was a lawfully admitted resident of the United States, but he was a citizen of Mexico. The Court ruled that citizenship discrimination was permitted, but national origin discrimination was not permitted.

After Espinoza, the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 (IRCA) changed the rules. IRCA was intended to eliminate job opportunities for unauthorized aliens attempting to illegally immigrate into the United States. However, IRCA also prohibits both national origin and Yet, there is a key distinction between noncitizens who are legally authorized to work in the United States and those who are not. Two cases from the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals held that U.S. employment discrimination laws do not apply to aliens who are not legally authorized to work in the United States. In Egbuna v. Time Life Libraries, Inc. (1998), the court ruled that a job applicant who is not authorized to work in the United States may not file suit under Title VII for an alleged discriminatory refusal to hire. Obiora Egbuna, a Nigerian national, claimed that Time-Life retaliated against him for participating in an EEOC investigation of a complaint where Egbuna had corroborated sexual harassment claims filed by another employee. Egbuna had been working in the United States under a valid student visa in 1989. That visa expired, but Egbuna continued to be employed illegally until 1993. He resigned in 1993, thinking he would return to Nigeria. He had not attempted to renew his visa, because he did not want to alert immigration officials of his illegal status. However, after he resigned, he changed his mind about leaving, and reapplied for work with Time-Life. They refused to rehire him, and Egbuna claimed the refusal was retaliation. The Court of Appeals held that because Egbuna could not legally work in the United States under the IRCA, he was not qualified for the job in question. Because he was not qualified, he could not prove a necessary element of a prima facie case of discrimination. Although Egbuna was inside the United States when he applied for the job, in another case the applicant was outside the United States. In Reyes-Gaona v. North Carolina Growers Ass’n (2001) the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled the ADEA does not apply to foreign citizens who apply in foreign countries for jobs inside the United States. While in Mexico, Luis Reyes-Gaona applied for a job located in the United States hoping his employer would help him get a temporary agricultural worker visa. In this case the court focused on the definition of covered employees. The court noted that it included U.S. citizens working for U.S. corporations abroad, but it did not include non-U.S. citizens seeking employment inside the United States. Based on its reading of the text of the statute, the court held that foreign citizens who apply outside the United States for a job inside the United States are not covered. Similarly, in Chaudhry v. Mobil Oil Corp. (1999), the Fourth Circuit ruled that a Canadian citizen who worked for Mobil outside the United States could not file suit under Title VII or the ADEA for Mobil’s refusal to promote him to a job inside the United States.

However, the EEOC disagrees with the Fourth Circuit and takes the position that U.S. employment discrimination laws do apply to jobs inside the United States, even for persons not legally authorized to work in the United States. Although EEOC positions are not binding on the courts, they do often influence how judges make their decisions. However, the EEOC recognizes that unauthorized or undocumented workers may not be entitled to receive back pay or reinstatement to a job because of their illegal status (EEOC Office of Legal Counsel, 1999, 2002). This position was adopted by the EEOC in response to the Supreme Court’s ruling in Hoffman Plastic Compounds, Inc. v. NLRB (2002). In that case the Court held that the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 (NLRA) does apply to undocumented illegal workers inside the United States. However, the court ruled that the plaintiff could not receive back pay for the period of time he would have been illegally working in the United States because it would violate the nation’s immigration policies under IRCA. The Supreme Court might rule similarly when faced with issues of back pay to plaintiffs who claim a violation of U.S. discrimination statutes.

Even if it is determined that undocumented workers are not protected under employment discrimination laws, significant civil and criminal sanctions exist under other laws such as IRCA and antiracketeering statutes to penalize employers who systematically employ undocumented workers (e.g., Mendoza v. Zirkle Fruit Co., 2002; Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act of 1970; Trollinger v. Tyson Foods Inc., 2002).

In addition, if an employer unknowingly hires a worker who is not legally authorized to work in the United States, then the employer has a legal obligation to terminate that employee whenever he/she discovers the worker’s illegal status (Hoffman Plastic Compounds v. NLRB, 2002; IRCA). In some cases, courts have denied employer requests to use legal discovery rules to order a plaintiff to produce documents showing that they are legally authorized to work in the United States (De La Rosa v. N. Harvest Furniture, 2002). This led to an unusual situation in Lopez v. Superflex, Ltd. (2002). In that case Antonio Lopez sued for discrimination under the ADA. His attorney advised him not to answer questions about his immigration status, presumably because he was illegally employed in the United States. Because of the ruling in Hoffman Plastic Compounds that undocumented workers are not entitled to back pay, Lopez withdrew his demand for back pay. However, the court permitted him to pursue a claim for punitive damages.

In summary, this review suggests that U.S. employment discrimination laws may apply to aliens inside the United States even though they are not U.S. citizens. In the Fourth Circuit the statutes do not apply to persons not legally authorized to work in the United States. However, the EEOC has taken the position that statutes should apply to people whether or not they are authorized to work in the United States. Furthermore, the Supreme Court may permit the application of the statutes but not authorize back pay remedies. The foregoing discussion leads to our second guideline.

Guideline 2: U.S. employment discrimination laws apply to jobs located inside the United States when the employer is an U.S. entity and the employee is not an U.S. citizen but is legally authorized to work in the United States. Depending on the jurisdiction, U.S. laws may apply to workers who are not authorized to work in the United States, although the remedies they receive may be limited.

International Law Defense: The Impact of International Treaties

Under the U.S. Constitution, international treaties are the supreme law of the land. They supersede any contradictory provisions of federal statutes (U.S. Constitution, Article VI; cf., Weinberger v. Rossi, 1982). U.S. diplomats have negotiated numerous treaties of friendship, commerce, and navigation (FCN) with other countries (e.g., FCN Italy, 1948; FCN Japan, 1953; Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 1953). Those treaties specify the rights and privileges of firms called foreign direct investors (FDIs; Schnitzer, 1999). While negotiating FCN treaties, U.S. diplomats insisted on provisions permitting U.S. firms operating in foreign countries to select their own executives (Silver, 1989; Walker, 1958). These provisions were intended to counter local laws that required hiring host country nationals for key management jobs. Reciprocal rights were granted to FDIs operating in the United States.

The North American Free Trade Agreement (1993) takes a slightly different approach. It prohibits the governments of Canada, Mexico, and the United States from requiring that FDIs operating in their country appoint persons to senior management positions based on their nationality. Furthermore, although a summary of the provisions of various foreign laws is beyond the scope of this article, it is interesting to compare the United States to our two nearest neighbors, Canada and Mexico, as they provide illustrative examples of the diversity of foreign laws.

In Canada employment discrimination laws are primarily enforced through provincial statutes (e.g., Human Rights Code, Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1990). However, workers in certain national industries (e.g., banking, airlines, railroads) are covered by a federal human rights statute. These provincial and federal statutes tend to provide much of the same protections as U.S. employment discrimination laws (sex, ethnic origin, age, disability), although they often use different terminology. For example, Canadian laws prohibit two types of sexual harassment: quid pro quo and poisoned work environment. These are generally comparable to the two types of sexual harassment, quid pro quo and hostile work environment that are outlawed in the United States. Canadian laws also recognize two types of discrimination: intentional direct discrimination and adverse impact (or constructive, systemic) discrimination. The first is somewhat similar to intentional disparate treatment discrimination, and the second is somewhat similar to unintentional disparate impact discrimination in the United States. Thus, employers operating in Canada need to be sensitive to the possible disparate impact of their employment practices. Furthermore, whereas U.S. laws recognize the bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ) as a possible defense for disparate treatment discrimination, Canadian laws recognize the bona fide occupational requirement (BFOR) as a defense. However, Canadian laws often provide additional protections not found in the U.S. federal statutes such as prohibition of discrimination based on sexual orientation, record of offenses, and marital or family status (Cohen, O’Byrne, & Maxwell, 1999).

By contrast, in Mexico employment discrimination is prohibited both by the national constitution and a federal statute (Posthuma, Dworkin, Torres, & Bustillos, 2000). There is little statutory protection or enforcement action at the state level. Although Mexican law has ostensibly prohibited disparate treatment discrimination based on sex, race, religion, age, political views, and nationality, it does not recognize the concept of disparate impact discrimination. However, labor unions and social action groups have charged that victims of employment discrimination have difficulty enforcing their rights or receiving compensation in Mexico (Chew & Posthuma, 2002; U.S. Department of State, 2000). In 2003, Mexico adopted a new law to expand the types of discrimination that are prohibited to include disability, social or financial condition, health condition, pregnancy, language, religion, opinion, sexual preference, marital status, or any other reason (Leal-Isla Garza, 2003). However, the new law does not create any new civil or criminal liabilities for employers. It is thought that this new law might discourage employers from using discriminatory practices such as preemployment pregnancy testing to exclude pregnant women from the applicant pool (Leal-Isla Garza, 2003). The new law also created an administrative council that could eventually give positive recognition to employers who voluntarily comply with the new law, or it could invoke some type of unspecified sanctions for employers who do not comply (Leal-Isla Garza, 2003). However, it remains to be seen whether this new law will have any substantial impact on employment practices in Mexico.

Back in the United States, the courts recognize that foreign employers operating inside the United States are covered by U.S. discrimination laws (Helm v. South African Airways, 1987; Mattison v. Canon USA, Inc., 1981; Porto v. Canon USA, Inc., 1981). Yet, they also have the right to employ citizens of their home country to manage their U.S. operations because of the rights granted to foreign corporations under FCN treaties (Fortino v. Quasar Co., 1991; MacNamara v. Korean Air Lines, 1988). The Supreme Court has established a general rule that a U.S. corporation that is a subsidiary of a foreign corporation generally may not invoke the treaty rights of its foreign parent corporation (Sumitomo Shoji America, Inc. v. Avagliano, 1982). However, other courts have carved out a narrow exception to the general rule. This exception permits domestic subsidiaries to invoke the treaty rights of their foreign parent corporation in cases where the foreign parent actually controlled employment decisions (Papaila v. Uniden Am. Corp., 1995; Spiess v. C. Itoh and Co. (Am.), 1981; Wallace v. SMC Pneumatics, Inc., 1997).

Furthermore, several courts have ruled that the right to prefer citizens of the corporate parent country does not permit discrimination based on other grounds. Linskey v. Heidelberg Eastern, Inc. (1979) illustrates the interplay between FCN treaties and the ADEA. A district court ruled that the FCN treaty between the United States and Denmark gave Danish corporations the right to hire Danish citizens to manage their operations in the United States. However, the court also ruled that the treaty did not justify the dismissal of a former employee who was a U.S. citizen. Plaintiff James Linskey, a 55-year-old U.S. citizen, alleged that he was fired because of his age and because he was not a Danish citizen. The court ruled the FCN treaty with Denmark gave the employer the right to hire its own citizens, but it was not permitted to do so if it would violate U.S. law that prohibits age discrimination.

Similarly, FCN treaty rights did not permit discrimination based on age or ethnicity in Adames v. Mitsubishi Bank, Ltd. (1990). Other courts have also ruled that the employer’s right under a treaty to prefer citizens does not permit discrimination on other grounds (Bennett v. Total Minatome Corp., 1998 (age, national origin, race); Linskey v. Heidelberg Eastern, Inc., 1979 (age); Shane v. Tokai Bank, 1997 (race, sex, or national origin). Also, a foreign corporation’s right under an FCN treaty to discriminate in favor of its own citizens does not give it the right to permit sexual harassment (Santerre v. AGIP Petroleum Co., 1999) or to discriminate in favor of citizens of a third country (Starrett v. Iberia Airlines of Spain, 1989).

However, citizenship and national origin are often highly correlated. Citizenship is a legal status question determined by a country’s immigration laws. National origin is a demographic characteristic that refers to the place where people or their ancestors were born. Nevertheless, one’s citizenship is often the same as one’s national origin. As a consequence, the right to discriminate based on citizenship (permitted by FCN treaties) may result in discrimination based on national origin (prohibited by Title VII).
This creates a potential conflict between treaty rights and employment discrimination laws.

The courts have found ways to avoid this conflict under both disparate treatment and disparate impact cases. Under disparate treatment, the plaintiff attempts to show that the employer intended to treat one person differently than another based on national origin (EEOC v. United Airlines, 2002; Lemnitzer v. Philippine Airlines, 1991). Thus, when an FDI invokes its treaty rights to hire its own citizens, it is probably also intentionally discriminating based on national origin. However, two courts ruled that the conflict between treaty rights and discrimination law can be avoided by requiring the employer to show that national origin is a BFOQ for the job in question. In this way, the FDI can utilize its treaty rights to prefer its own citizens but also defend the intentional preference based on national origin as a BFOQ (Avagliano v. Sumitomo Shoji America, Inc., 1981; Goyette v. DCA Advertising, Inc., 1993).

Disparate impact requires a showing that one group is disproportionately excluded (e.g., not hired) when compared to another group. To avoid the conflict between Title VII and FCN treaty rights, one court ruled that the disparate impact theory of discrimination simply does not apply to foreign corporations covered by FCN treaties (Weeks v. Samsung Heavy Indus. Co., 1997).

For foreign government agencies operating inside the United States, the general rule is that they are immune from U.S. employment discrimination statutes unless they are engaged in commercial activities (Elliot v. British Tourist Authority, 1997; Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976). For example, in Kato v. Ishihara (2002), the court dismissed the sexual harassment complaint of Yuka Kato because she was an employee of the Tokyo Municipal Government (TMG) on temporary assignment in New York. As a civil servant her employment was not commercial so sovereign immunity applied to TMG.

However, the cases reflect two types of commercial activities that are not immune. The first type consists of activities that have a commercial purpose. This includes marketing the products of a foreign country (Holden v. Canadian Consulate, 1996; Segni v. Commercial Office of Spain, 1987) or operating an airline (Carponcy v. Air France, 1985; Gazder v. Air India, 1983). The second type consists of employment that is considered commercial. This includes secretarial work performed by persons who are not civil servants (Zveiter v. Brazilian Nat’l Superintendency of Merchant Marine, 1993) and matters such as pay raises, promotions, and working conditions (Hansen v. Danish Tourist Board, 2001).

In addition, when dealing with foreign government agencies, issues of diplomatic immunity may also arise under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations (1964; Vienna Convention) and the Foreign Service Immunity Act (2000; FSIA). However, like the cases noted above, when employees perform nondiplomatic functions the employment relationship is considered “commercial” and, therefore, not protected by the FSIA. For example, in Mukaddam v. Permanent Mission of Saudi Arabia (2000), Rajaa Al Mukaddam sued under Title VII claiming she was harassed, terminated, and retaliated against based on her sex. The plaintiff was an American citizen hired in New York City to work in the diplomatic offices of the Saudi Arabian government. Her duties included general administrative and clerical duties, but she was not part of policy deliberations and was not authorized to speak on behalf of the Saudi government. The court held that Mukaddam’s employment was a commercial activity because her work was administrative/clerical and she was not a civil servant or a member of the diplomatic staff of the Saudi government. Therefore, the Mission was not immune. The court also ruled that the Vienna Convention did not provide immunity for the Saudi Arabian government because the Convention does not grant absolute immunity to foreign governments regarding the hiring and firing of their personnel. The cases above illustrate the following guidelines.

Guideline 3: U.S. employment discrimination laws do not apply to jobs located inside the U.S. when the employer is a foreign entity exempted by a treaty, even though the employee is authorized to work in the United States.

Guideline 4: U.S. employment discrimination laws apply to jobs located inside the United States when the employer is a foreign entity not exempted by a treaty and the employee is authorized to work in the United States.

Jobs Located Outside the United States

Location of Work

In many cases there are disputes about whether a plaintiff’s employment should be considered extraterritorial. The typical case involves a non-U.S. citizen seeking to establish that the work was located in the United States. For employers, this is a key issue because if the plaintiff is not a U.S. citizen and the location of the work is outside the United States, then U.S. discrimination laws do not apply.

These cases show that the courts consider a variety of factors when addressing the issue of work location. The particular facts of a case may influence which factors are more or less relevant. Five of the most important factors are summarized below.
First, in cases involving staffing issues (e.g., hiring and termination) it is well settled that the determination of whether a job is extraterritorial focuses primarily on the location(s) where the employee performs his or her duties and not the location where the discriminatory decisions occurred (e.g., the refusal or termination decision). In these cases courts have consistently rejected something we call the “place of decision theory,” and instead they have focused on the location of the plaintiff’s workstation (Denty v. SmithKline Beecham Corp., 1997; Mithani v. Lehman Bros., Inc., 2001). This is especially important for employees who are not U.S. citizens. For non-U.S. citizens, if their workstation is outside the United States, then U.S. discrimination laws do not apply even though they were recruited, hired, and trained in the United States (Shekoyan v. Sibley Int’l Corp., 2002). Furthermore, this holds true even if a decision to terminate their employment is made inside the United States by the U.S. parent corporation (Iwata v. Stryker Corp., 1999).

Similarly, in cases involving sexual harassment, the location of the workstation plays a key role in determining whether Title VII applies. For example, in Peterson v. DeLoitte & Touche (1993), the court ruled that Title VII did not apply to sexual harassment because it happened in Russia before the adoption of the extraterritorial amendments to Title VII. Also, in Arno v. Club Med (1994), the plaintiff filed a complaint at Club Med headquarters in New York about the alleged rape and sexual harassment she suffered at the hands of her supervisor while working at a resort in Guadeloupe, France. However, the court held that even though she filed her complaint in the United States, at the company’s headquarters, because the harassment occurred outside the United States and before the adoption of the extraterritorial amendments to Title VII, the employer had no duty to investigate or take remedial action.

Furthermore, if the plaintiff is not a U.S. citizen, the location of the alleged sexual harassment is important. In Mota v. Univ. of Tex. Houston Health Sci. Ctr. (2001) the court ruled that because the plaintiff was a foreign citizen, the alleged incidents of sexual harassment occurring in Mexico were not covered by Title VII. The court explained that Title VII does not apply to harassment that occurs outside the United States to noncitizens. Dr. Luis Mota, a Venezuelan citizen, alleged several incidents of same-sex sexual harassment against his department chair that occurred in their Houston offices, and at academic conferences in Philadelphia, Breckenridge, Orlando, and Monterrey, Mexico. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that jurisdiction could not be asserted based on the sexual harassment that occurred in Mexico because Mota was not a U.S. citizen. Nevertheless, the court found the other incidents of sexual harassment occurring inside the U.S. were sufficient to bestow jurisdiction. Therefore, the court upheld the jury’s verdict and award of damages.
Second, the fact that an employee performed some work in the United States does not preclude a finding that his or her work for the employer was extraterritorial. The percent of time the employee spent working in the United States versus overseas is often a key factor. For example, in Gantchar v. United Airlines (1995), the court held that spending approximately 20% of one’s working time in the United States was inadequate to establish that the plaintiff’s workstation was in the United States. Yet the court also stated that there is no “bright line rule that work performed less than 50% within the U.S. is necessarily extraterritorial” (Gantchar v. United Airlines, 1995, p. 35). Furthermore, Barbosa v. Merck & Co. (2002), suggests that the percent of work time that must be in the United States to establish a U.S. workstation depends on the nature of the work performed. Presumably, the more important the work done in the United States, the less time would be needed to establish a workstation in the United States. Thus, the percent of time spent working in the United States is a key factor. However, it is not necessarily determinative.

Third, the question whether the plaintiff was employed abroad or was employed in the United States, but merely temporarily deployed overseas, is a factual issue that the court must ultimately resolve. In addressing that issue the Torrico v. IBM (2002) court adopted a “center of gravity” test assessing “the totality of the circumstances.” Important factors include a preexisting employment relationship (and where it was created), intent of the parties concerning the location of the employment relationship, location of job duties, location where benefits were received, location of reporting relationships, duration of assignments, and the domicile of the employer and employee.

The Torrico court held the facts alleged by the plaintiff could support a finding that the plaintiff was employed in the United States and only temporarily assigned to Chile. Of particular relevance to the court were allegations that the plaintiff was employed by IBM in the United States before his assignment to Chile, he did not take on new responsibilities in Chile, he spent a substantial time traveling to IBM’s U.S. headquarters, his activities were controlled and directed by executives in the United States, and IBM had made statements characterizing the plaintiff’s work in Chile as temporary. The court based its decision on a consideration of these factors and denied IBM’s motion to dismiss the case for lack of jurisdiction.

Fourth, in deciding the location of work issue, courts will scrutinize how the parties treated the work arrangement before the dispute arose. For example, the Torrico court noted that IBM’s letter of agreement with Torrico stated that his assignment was temporary in nature. Furthermore, on at least two occasions IBM informed immigration officials in Chile that his assignment was temporary.
Finally, recent court decisions suggest a liberalizing of the location-of-work standards to reflect today’s globalized environment. Employees increasingly work in multiple locations, with work in one location intertwined with work in another location, making it difficult to describe employee activities as limited to one locale, either domestic or foreign (Moldof, 2002). In both Torrico v. IBM (2002) and Barbosa v. Merck & Co. (2002), the courts indicated that it may be possible for an individual to have two (or more) legal workstations.

Employer Status

Generally, U.S. discrimination statutes do not apply to jobs located outside the United States when the employer is a foreign entity. For example, in Robinson v. Overseas Military Sales Corp. (OMSC; 1993), Howard E. Robinson, a 60-year-old U.S. citizen, sued OMSC alleging he had been fired because of age discrimination. He worked for OMSC in Korea selling cars to military personnel. OMSC is a Swiss corporation with an office in New York. The district court ruled the ADEA did not apply to a U.S. citizen working outside the United States for a foreign corporation. This case illustrates the following guideline.

Guideline 5: U.S. employment discrimination laws do not apply to jobs located outside the United States when the employer is a foreign entity, even though the employee is a U.S. citizen.

Employee Status

Generally, U.S. employment discrimination laws apply to U.S. citizens (including Puerto Ricans) working inside the United States. However, the citizenship status of the employee or job applicant is critically important for jobs located outside the United States when the employer is a U.S. entity. For example, in Hu v. Skadden, Arps, Slate, Maegher & Flom, LLP (Skadden; 1999), a district court ruled that William Hu, a lawful resident of the United States and Chinese citizen, could not sue under the ADEA. Hu was a recent law school graduate who had previously worked for the defendant law firm as a legal assistant. He applied at Skadden’s New York offices for a job in their Beijing and Hong Kong offices. The plaintiff alleged he was not hired because of his age. The court noted that the job search occurred inside the United States and that Skadden conducted interviews and made hiring decisions in their New York offices. However, the ADEA did not apply because Hu was a Chinese citizen and the job was located in China. Other courts have also ruled that Title VII and the ADEA do not apply to jobs outside the United States for persons who are not U.S.

Guideline 6: U.S. employment discrimination laws do not apply to jobs located outside the United States even if the employer is a U.S. entity, if the employees are foreign citizens.

International Law Defense: The Impact of Conflicts Between U.S. and Foreign Laws

The ADEA, Title VII, and the ADA have been amended to follow the general principle of international law that U.S. laws may not be applied extraterritorially where they would conflict with foreign laws (Restatement, 1987). Under this principle, employers may claim that U.S. discrimination laws should be not applied to their foreign operations where it would cause them to violate foreign law (i.e., the foreign law defense).

For example, in Mahoney v. RFE/RL, Inc. (1995), the issue was whether breaching a collective bargaining agreement in a foreign country would violate that country’s laws, and if so, if that would exempt the employer from compliance with the ADEA. Two U.S. citizens working in Germany for Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty (RFE/RL) were forced to retire at the age of 65 years. RFE/RL is a U.S. nonprofit corporation headquartered in Munich, Germany. It had a collective bargaining agreement, modeled after the nation-wide agreement in the German broadcast industry, requiring employees to retire at the age of 65 years. For most jobs the ADEA prohibits mandatory retirement based on age. All efforts by RFE/RL to obtain an exemption from this rule from German government agencies failed. Therefore, the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that requiring RFE/RL to violate the German collective bargaining agreement would be forcing it to violate the “law” of a foreign country because in Germany labor agreements take on the force of law.

Other than the Mahoney case, the courts have not interpreted the meaning of the foreign law defense. However, there are several cases dealing with the issue of whether the customs or laws of foreign countries might constitute a BFOQ defense. These cases were decided before the 1991 amendments that provided employers with a statutory foreign law defense. Nevertheless, they provide guidance on the type of foreign customs and laws that the courts would likely find to be a legitimate foreign law defenses today. In fact, in cases where employers have a BFOQ based on a foreign law, they may also have a valid foreign law defense. For example, if there is a foreign law that makes being the member of a certain religion a requirement of the job, it is a BFOQ and would also be a valid foreign law defense.

These cases range from mere social customs that are not valid BFOQs to formal laws enforced by foreign governments that are valid BFOQs. For example, in Fernandez v. Wynn Oil Co. (1981), the court ruled that stereotypes about the proper roles of men and women did not justify a preference for hiring a man for the position of Vice President of International Operations. The court rejected the employer’s claim that sex was a BFOQ in Latin America because women would have difficulty conducting business from a hotel room. This is an example of a social custom that was not a valid BFOQ and probably would not constitute a valid foreign law defense today.

Furthermore, assertions or opinions about what the law is in a foreign country or citation to legal treatises about foreign law are not enough to create a valid BFOQ or foreign law defense (Pfeiffer v. Wm. Wrigley Jr. Co., 1985). For example, in Abrams v. Baylor College of Medicine (1986), the court ruled that a belief that Jews would not be granted entry and exit visas was not enough to justify failure to send Jewish doctors to work in a hospital in Saudi Arabia. Presumably, a more definitive determination of the Saudi law would be required for the foreign law to be a BFOQ.

However, formal doctrines with serious consequences enforced by foreign governments are likely to constitute both a valid BFOQ and foreign law defense. For example, in Kern v. Dynalectron (1983), Wade Kern sued for religious discrimination when he was constructively discharged from the job of a helicopter pilot. The job entailed flying a helicopter into Mecca, a holy area inside Saudi Arabia according to the Islamic religion. The religious laws of Saudi Arabia prohibit non-Muslims from entering Mecca. Because Kern was a Baptist and not a Muslim, Islamic law would require that he be beheaded for entering Mecca. The court held that religion was a BFOQ for this job because of the religious laws enforced in Saudi Arabia. If decided today, a court would also likely find this to be a valid foreign law defense. These cases illustrate the following guidelines.

Guideline 7: U.S. employment discrimination laws apply to jobs located outside the United States when the employer is a U.S. entity and the employee is a U.S. citizen, if compliance with U.S. laws would not violate foreign laws.

Guideline 8: U.S. employment discrimination laws do not apply to jobs located outside the United States when the employer is a U.S. entity and the employee is a U.S. citizen, if compliance with U.S. laws would violate foreign laws.
General Observations and Recommendations

Organizationally Sensible and Responsible Decisions

So far, this article has focused on a legal analysis of U.S. employment discrimination laws and their application to international employers. This analysis suggests that in many circumstances international employers may influence whether U.S. discrimination laws apply to their employment relationships through the policies that they adopt, the practices they implement, and their conduct in dealing with employees. Sometimes that influence is exerted unknowingly, with results the employer later regrets (e.g., IBM’s conduct toward Torrico, discussed earlier). A clear lesson from this review and analysis is that I-O psychologists working with international employers should give thoughtful consideration to the issues associated with the application of U.S. discrimination law to their workforce before disputes arise.

All international employers need to consider the legal issues associated with the potential application of U.S. discrimination laws to their workforce. Yet, the question of whether an international employer should attempt to influence the law that applies to their workforce, and if so, in which direction, is one that transcends legal analysis. The threat of employment litigation is obviously a legitimate consideration. However, organizationally sensible and responsible decisions require that other factors be taken into account, including ethical issues, the organization’s espoused values, and potential human resource management concerns (e.g., impact on the organization’s ability to attract and retain desired employees; Roehling & Wright, 2004). The following section addresses several of these factors and provides guidance that will help I-O psychologists contribute to international employer policies and practices that are both legally defensible and organizationally sensible.

Keys to Managing the International Employment Law Landscape

Make consistency and organizational justice primary concerns. Consistency in the substance, symbolism, and application of organizational policies and practices is a critical issue (Baron & Kreps, 1999). Consistent policies and practices provide employees a clearer sense of what they can expect and what is expected of them. Inconsistent policies and practices may create mistrust. Perceived inconsistencies in the application of policies within an organization may contribute to invidious social comparisons and feelings of distributive injustice. Thus, in deciding whether to enthusiastically embrace, passively accept, or seek to avoid the application of U.S. discrimination laws, a primary concern should be the extent to which the organization’s decision will be perceived by employees as consistent with the organization’s stated mission, espoused values, and existing policies and practices.

Many international firms have adopted globally consistent policies and practices in order to bolster a uniform corporate culture (Briscoe & Schuler, 2004). Yet, it should be kept in mind that global consistency may present a dilemma for international employers because they often face pressures for local differentiation and adaptation of their practices in different countries.

In addition to inconsistencies between employer policies in different countries, inconsistencies may be perceived in the application of policies across employees. This may occur in an international workplace where some employees are covered by U.S. employment discrimination laws whereas others are not. Employees who are not covered by U.S. employment discrimination laws may compare themselves to those who are and perceive relative unfairness. This kind of inconsistency may be addressed by the adoption of a uniform policy that guarantees all employees the substantive protection of U.S. discrimination laws. Where there is a legitimate basis for not adopting such a uniform policy, the importance of using only valid job-related criteria for all employees, whether or not they are covered by U.S. laws, becomes even greater. When the employment practices are clearly job-related, employees are more likely to perceive that the decisions are distributively and procedurally fair and may be less likely to file charges of discrimination (Goldman, 2001).

Compared to the typical manager, I-O psychologists are likely to have a greater appreciation of the importance of consistency for employees’ perceptions of fairness, and ultimately, positive employer–employee relations. Therefore, I-O psychologists should assume a special responsibility for raising and addressing consistency and fairness issues in international employment settings. For example, if a company is considering moving part of its operations outside of the United States to avoid the restrictions of U.S. discrimination laws, I-O psychologists can contribute to an organizationally sensible decision by informing the employer of the findings from research regarding organizational reputation and attractiveness. This research indicates that if moving operations overseas to avoid U.S. employment laws is viewed by job applicants and employees as inconsistent with the organization’s espoused values, it may negatively affect the employer’s ability to attract and retain desired employees in its U.S. offices and other operations (Greenig & Turban, 2000; Roehling & Winters, 2000; Turban & Greenig, 1997).

Conduct professional job analyses that yield written job descriptions. Professionally conducted job analyses and written job descriptions take on increased importance in many international employment situations. In addition to helping ensure job-related practices that will promote employees’ perceptions of fairness, courts deciding international employment disputes give great weight to job descriptions that are based on job analyses conducted prior to the dispute. For example, job descriptions have played a critical role in helping courts to determine that a subsidiary can assert its parent company’s FCN treaty right to prefer to hire citizens of the employer’s home country. Conversely, the treaty right to prefer the employer’s home country citizens has been rejected because the foreign employer’s job description did not show the need for the special skills of a foreign executive (Goyette v. DCA Advertising, Inc., 1993; Sumitomo Shoji America, Inc. v. Avagliano, 1982). Foreign employers operating in the United States should only consider giving preferences to foreign citizens when there is a job description documenting the importance of foreign citizenship for the position in question (e.g., a need for familiarity with the parent company, knowledge of foreign markets, customs). Furthermore, the ability to use English, Spanish, and/or some other language can be an important job-related criteria that should be specified in the written job description when applicable. By documenting the job relatedness of the language skill in a job description, employers are in a better position to defend their choice of the language used in various selection instruments.

I-O psychologists should also consider the potential value of written job descriptions as evidence bearing on the location of an employee’s work, an issue that may affect whether U.S. discrimination laws apply. Examples of job description content that may be relevant to the work location issue include information regarding the job holder’s reporting relationships, descriptions of job responsibilities that indicate where the essential responsibilities will be performed, and how much time they will be performed in different countries (Torrico v. IBM, 2002).

The increased importance of professionally conducted job analyses in international employment situations is also due, more generally, to the greater ambiguity regarding legal requirements when compared to solely domestic employment situations. When specific steps that will provide a legally defensible procedure cannot be clearly ascertained, the need to provide documented, job-related, and nondiscriminatory reasons for all employment policies, practices, and decisions becomes even more critical.

Verify local “legal concerns” that are offered as a basis for differentiating staffing practices. I-O psychologists developing global staffing systems sometimes encounter pressure to differentiate staffing practices across countries due to concerns about local laws (Ryan et al., 2003). This situation raises a U.S. employment law concern if the local staffing practice is one that will be applied to U.S. citizens working abroad, and it potentially conflicts with U.S. employment laws (e.g., a practice of not hiring women for certain jobs). The perception of the local law may suggest a possible foreign law defense that, if established, would allow the employer to adopt the local practice. However, in order to establish the foreign law defense, the local staffing practice must be based on an actual foreign law requirement and not mere social norms, customer preferences, or perceived legal concerns. Recent research indicates that local staffing practices that are perceived as legally required often do not reflect actual legal requirements (Ryan et al., 2003). Thus, before adopting a local staffing practice that will be applied to U.S. citizens working abroad and potentially conflict with U.S. employment laws, it is absolutely essential that the existence of a local law requiring the practice be verified (i.e., consult an attorney with relevant expertise and request an opinion letter).

Design internationally sensitive training. The concerns associated with the application of U.S. discrimination laws to international employers suggest several training needs. I-O psychologists can design and deliver managerial training to increase the awareness of how statements and conduct in dealing with employees may provide evidence that impacts the legal obligations and ultimately the liability of employers. Such training might address, for example, how statements made to reassure an employee being transferred to an overseas subsidiary may inadvertently constitute evidence that the employee’s location of work remained in the United States. Foreign managers coming to the United States should receive training that familiarizes them with U.S. discrimination laws. In addition to reducing the likelihood of violations occurring, the fact that the employer provided such training is evidence of the employer’s good faith that may, in some circumstances, reduce the employer’s liability for punitive damages. Conversely, U.S. managers going abroad should receive training that familiarizes them with the employment laws of their host country.

Finally, international employers should assess the need for all employees operating in foreign countries to receive cross-cultural training that addresses cultural differences that may cause employment-related litigation. For example, it has been observed that when foreign employers operate inside the United States, they may bring with them cultural perspectives that do not carry the same level of concern for issues of sexual harassment. Therefore, foreign employers operating inside the United States may benefit from cross-cultural training for managers that addresses different perceptions of appropriate treatment of persons based on sex, ethnicity, and other protected characteristics (Taylor & Eder, 2000).

Consider the impact of organizational structure and job design on legal obligations. The work of contemporary I-O psychologists includes helping organizations improve their organizational structure and job design (SIOP, 1999). In the present context, this requires an understanding of how an international employer’s organizational structure may impact its legal obligations under U.S. employment laws.
International management systems are centralized to varying degrees (e.g., ethnocentric, polycentric, geocentric: Adler, 1983; Caligiuri & Stroh, 1995; Heenan & Perlmutter, 1979). This may include centralized control of employee recruiting and selection systems (Ryan et al., 2003), performance management and appraisal systems, and employee compensation systems. The degree to which a foreign parent company exercises control over its U.S. subsidiary may affect legal obligations in at least two ways. On one hand, the more control that a foreign parent exercises over employment matters in the subsidiary, the more likely it will be that their foreign employees will be counted in determining the applicability of U.S. employment discrimination laws and higher damage limits. This means that where there are relatively few employees in the U.S. subsidiary (below the minimum threshold for U.S. discrimination laws to apply), the parent’s extensive control over employment matters in the subsidiary may result in U.S. discrimination laws applying. However, if the parent had exercised less control, the laws would not have applied.

On the other hand, the more that the parent exercises centralized control over employment matters, thereby minimizing the involvement of the subsidiary in setting terms and conditions of employment, the more likely it will be that the FCN treaty defense will apply. The treaty defense will be less likely to apply where the U.S. subsidiary is involved in employment decisions (e.g., compensation, promotion) relating to expatriates. Thus, in terms of addressing U.S. employment law concerns, the desirability of greater centralized control of employment matters will depend on the international employer’s most pressing concern (keeping the subsidiaries workforce number down to avoid the application of U.S. discrimination laws versus ensuring the availability of the FCN treaty defense to allow preferences for foreign expatriates).

The degree to which U.S. firms exercise centralized control over their operations in foreign countries may also affect the extent to which their workforce is covered by U.S. discrimination laws. The mere fact that decisions were made at the U.S. corporate headquarters office is not likely to invoke the applicability of U.S. discrimination laws for jobs outside the United States. However, the more that control of employment relationships are centralized in the United States, the more likely the work location will be considered to be inside the United States. Of course, for both foreign companies with operations in the United States and U.S. companies with operations overseas, the optimal extent of centralized control in an organization is likely to depend on a variety of other relevant factors, both legal and nonlegal (cf., Ferrand v. Credit Lyonnais, 2003).

The issue of centralized control has potential implications for the design of jobs in international organizations (e.g., the amount of autonomy given managers in overseas operations, the desirability of decision-making teams that include both expatriates and locals). Also, when providing job design advice to foreign government employers operating inside the United States, I-O psychologists should recognize that the addition or deletion of commercial as opposed to governmental functions to the job could affect the applicability of U.S. employment discrimination laws. Generally, designing a job to include only commercial activity (e.g., clerical work) may exclude the job from treaty-based immunity and invoke the application of U.S. employment discrimination laws. However, when the job includes more governmental functions (e.g., setting policy, diplomatic activities), then the treaty-based immunities may apply.

Consider international legal implications in designing recruiting and selection procedures. The cases suggest several things for I-O psychologists who design recruiting and selection procedures for work that crosses international borders. First, when I-O psychologists establish job requirements for employee selection systems, they should know which laws apply so that they can determine what criteria may be prohibited or required. For example, in the U.S. age and national origin are prohibited forms of discrimination. Yet, when recruiting in the U.S. for work in another country: age, citizenship, and immigration status may be job-related requirements. Second, where an employer believes that national origin should be a job-related selection criteria, then I-O psychologists can perform a job analysis to collect data and prepare documentation to support this claim in the event that they are asked to testify as an expert witness in any subsequent claim of employment discrimination. Similarly, where familiarity with language, religion, or culture are claimed to be essential job functions or BFOQs, I-O psychologists are well trained to develop tests, structured interviews, and assessment centers that can distinguish those who are qualified from those who are not. Job analysis and selection instruments developed for employers in the U.S., where these criteria are prohibited, are unlikely to capture these potentially important dimensions.

Also, because many of the court cases discussed above differentiate national origin from citizenship, I-O psychologists may need to develop measures of national origin that are distinct from measures of immigration status and citizenship status. Such measures may go beyond asking where someone was born but also include items measuring the time spent in a country and familiarity with culture, language, and the origin of one’s ancestors.

Furthermore, when employers recruit workers from outside the United States to work inside the United States, they need to audit and monitor the status of employees working under immigration visas. Those trained in the verification of employment qualifications can monitor the immigration status of employees working inside the United States. I-O psychologists can also aid employers in recruiting and selecting workers from outside the United States to work inside the United States. However, in so doing they will need to know which forms of employment requirements will be permitted and which will not. Despite the rulings of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, discussed above, recruiters going outside the United States probably should not assume that discrimination based on age, sex, and so on will be permitted outside the United States for jobs to be performed inside the United States.

Recognize the potential value of written employment contracts. Written employment agreements are an increasingly attractive option for specifying relevant terms and conditions in international employment settings (Boskey, 1999; Exten-Wright, 2002; Hoguet & Dansicker, 1997). From a legal perspective, written documentation provides evidence that is given great weight by the courts and is often viewed as dispositive on the issue of which country’s laws apply (Sabiru-Perez, 2000). In practice, this means that written contracts will increasingly constrain (or enable) international employers’ ability to make employment decisions (e.g., discipline, compensation, training, discharge).

From a behavioral science perspective, written contracts may help create clear expectations that guide performance (both supervisor and employee) and avoid the kind of unpleasant surprises that may lead to employee turnover or litigation. I-O psychologists familiar with the psychological contract research literature (e.g., Rousseau, 1998) can facilitate contracting because of their special understanding of the psychological processes involved in forming employment contracts (both written and unwritten).

International treaties (e.g., Rome Convention, 1980) and the courts in most countries generally permit the parties considerable autonomy in designating the law that will apply to their employment contract, so long as a substantial relationship exists between the country chosen and the parties (Sabiru-Perez, 2000; Yamakawa, 1992). Employment contracts may also include the parties’ understanding regarding the location (i.e., country) of the employee’s work, because this is often a critical issue in deciding the applicability of U.S. employment discrimination laws. In reflecting the parties’ understanding, it may be desirable to include the specific conditions under which the employee’s location of work will be deemed to have changed during the period of the contract (e.g., the conditions under which a temporary assignment overseas will become a “permanent” assignment, thereby shifting the location of the job to the overseas country). Finally, when an employee is expected to spend significant time working in two or more countries, written employment agreements should include a provision addressing the issue of which country’s laws will apply in the event of a dispute.
Other guidance for addressing the U.S. employment law uncertainty. I-O psychologists working with international employers should be aware of three additional strategies for managing the uncertainty associated with the application of U.S. discrimination laws in international settings. First, U.S. employers with operations overseas should assume that both U.S. discrimination laws and the employment laws of the host country will apply to their overseas workforce, and to the extent possible, endeavor to meet the requirements of both. Second, the adoption of a written corporate code of conduct should be considered. Such codes may reduce the kind of inappropriate behaviors that lead to employment litigation by providing clear standards for supervisors and employees, and they may also contribute to a positive corporate image in the eyes of current and potential employees and shareholders (Westfield, 2002a). Third, international employers should adopt internal grievance procedures and alternative dispute resolution (ADR) practices (e.g., arbitration) to mitigate the costs of employee–employer disputes when they arise. The benefits of ADR (e.g., reduced cost, speedier resolution of disputes, avoidance of unfamiliar and/or potentially hostile legal forums) make it particularly attractive in international employment settings (Boskey, 1999; Westfield, 2002b).
